

Happy feet

What's underfoot constitutes one of the largest style components of your home. It's not always front of mind when making decisions about how you'd like your home to look and feel, but it should be

WORDS CARROL BAKER

Flooring infuses personality and ambience. It's tactile and emotive, and adds a certain style to your home. Even though your first sensory experience and interaction within a space is visual, the tactile experience that flooring evokes comes a close second.

Christian Grennan from Kreis Grennan Architecture says flooring should always be given careful and due consideration. "It's the surface that you make contact with the most; you are touching it almost continuously as you walk around," he says.

Flooring materials can create a beautiful emotive consciousness and when used cleverly, they create a design aesthetic that enhances connectivity between spaces. The right type of flooring can make a space feel more generous in size, and it can elevate the comfort factor by virtue of how it feels.

Flooring doesn't have to cost the earth. There is a large gamut of price points that offer flexibility. That is unless you have your heart set on the Pietra Primas LuxTouch tile. It has 95 cut diamonds and costs a mere $1 million per square metre.

While you probably won't be in the market for flooring with that price tag, there are many stunning options that offer beauty, durability and charm.

Image courtesy of Planium, planium.com

